To answer, I'd need to know what you already know, why it's not working, and what else you know from past experience that might help. You're not going to be able to answer your own question until you answer the first question. Instead, you might ask the community, share your knowledge, help others, and earn points. Does/did the ministry of magic ever use the time turner to kill a single person? I saw this in an episode and I don't remember much about it. A: It's not very clear from the show, but it was implied that they had used the Time-Turner to kill only one person: Despite the Time-Turner's existence, it's never used in this manner. Presumably, that's because it would require disposing of a Time-Turner before using it (presumably to "bring back the body" afterwards), which would be a silly requirement in any case (because how would the person be resurrected?) However, we see that the Time-Turner's existence is not a secret to the Muggle community: This is a reference to The Hand of Glory, which allows the user to bring someone back from the dead (and which, to my knowledge, is unique to the Wizarding world). In this episode, they use the Time-Turner on an opponent in a duel against Dumbledore and Harry, and the only mention of the Time-Turner is that it's a powerful tool. We don't see the rest of the scene, but we see that Dumbledore doesn't 82157476af
